Political Science at UNT Dallas

Program Advisor: Walt Borges

The political science major at UNT Dallas offers traditional and innovative approaches to preparing graduates for work, further study and participation in government, law and communications. The program blends the study of government and human political behavior in a major that is designed to be interdisciplinary, using insights from sociology, psychology, economics and the management sciences in addition to providing foundational knowledge about political theory, political institutions and international affairs.

Political science has a deeper relevance to modern life: students will acquire knowledge at the macro level about how the world is structured and works, but students will also cultivate and understanding of how politics functions in the workplace, neighborhoods and small groups. Political science majors will become discerning consumers of political messages and understand the importance of political context in communication.

The value of an undergraduate political science degree in the job market is considerable. Political science majors find jobs in:

- Federal, state and local government.
- Political campaigns.
- Public affairs communications.
- Lobbying for interest groups, non-governmental organizations and corporations.
- Law.
- Journalism.

A political science major is also good preparation for professional degree programs in:

- Law (JD)
- Public Administration (MPA)
- Policy-based programs in business, health and education (MBA, MPH etc.).
- Journalism (MJ).

Sequences in political science will include:

- Public and Constitutional Law – this track will provide preparation for law school, but it is also useful to those involved in criminal justice programs.
- Urban politics – UNT Dallas is an urban university that seeks to prepare students for careers in city government and politics.
- Elections and campaigns – Understanding the mechanics of public opinion and party and candidate campaigns is important to the survival of modern democracies.
- International relations – Politics among nations is different from local, state and national politics and warrants its own type of analysis. UNT Dallas hopes to eventually develop area study programs that will focus on Mexico and other nations in Central and South America.
The UNT Dallas political science major requires students to take three foundational courses and a capstone course. The three foundational courses are Democratic Theory, Quantitative Research Design and Analysis, and Introduction to Public Administration. The foundational courses provide theoretical, analytical and management underpinnings for courses in the major. The required courses are three credit hours each but are yet to be numbered.

Political science encompasses four major subfields: American Government (A), International Affairs and Comparative Government (R), Public Law (L), and Political Behavior (B). Political science majors will be required to take at least one 3-hour course from each subfield. Because UNT Dallas is an urban university, we suggest all political science majors take PSCI 4220 Urban Politics to satisfy the American Government field requirement.

Another 12 elective hours of Political Science courses must be completed by majors, giving graduates 36 hours of upper level political science courses. Majors must maintain a 2.5 grade-point average to graduate.

A minor in political science requires 18 hours: PSCI 1040 and PSCI 1050 (3 semester hours each), plus 12 semester hours in political science (PSCI) that include 6 hours from advanced courses.

Political Science, BA

4. Electives: To ensure that graduates have a broad context in evaluating public affairs and policy matters, 42 hours of electives are designated. History, sociology, criminal justice and policy studies courses in other disciplines are strongly recommended to meet this requirement.

5. Other Requirements: All students entering the Political Science program must have a cumulative Grade Point Average of at least 2.0 and be in good academic standing.
